The injury from the workplace and making claims for the injury is usually emotionally and physically difficult. This is because the hurt person must likewise persevere an injury claim whilst also suffering from the injury.

In exchange for giving up their right to sue for work-related injuries; employees receive guaranteed compensation for accepted claims under the workers insurance system. Making use of premiums, the employer finances the program. This is of benefit to the employer, who is given protection from court cases under this system of collective liability. Hurt personnel and their loved ones are given fair compensation, while expenses are spread among employers.

Employees may however, sue workers in some conditions. Personnel may file a suit against workers which are industry exempt from the workers insurance program. Employees could sue fellow employees if they were "outside the course of their employment" when the injury took place. A worker may be entitled to settlement under the insurance plan with respect to a disease or an injury, and could likewise be entitled to sue a person in respect of the injury; for instance, a person driving in the course of their employment could file a suit against the driver of the vehicle which injured them.
